What is Taekwondo Defense?

Taekwondo Defense is a modern, practical form of self-defense employed by martial artists, as well as police and military units in countries like South Korea and Mexico. Unlike other self-defense systems, it is specifically founded on Taekwondo techniques. Since 2022, this community has been steadily expanding across Europe, attracting an ever-increasing number of trainers and clubs.

Why Taekwondo Defense?

Today's Taekwondo practice generally falls into two main categories: the Olympic sport style and the traditional style. While both approaches emphasize technique and discipline, they often provide limited focus on practical self-defense - an area many trainers and athletes identify as lacking. Taekwondo Defense bridges this gap by offering dynamic, reality-based techniques that complement traditional Taekwondo training and address the demands of a modern environment.

By becoming licensed TKDD instructors, coaches gain a valuable program that appeals to both new and experienced students - meeting a growing need for effective self-defense skills in today's world.

Who can learn Taekwondo Defense?

Taekwondo Defense is open to martial artists from any discipline, and it can be learned and applied effectively even without a background in Olympic-style Taekwondo.

Masters

The Taekwondo Defense Federation (TKDD) in South Korea is already well-established and professionally organized, offering both Dan certifications and trainer licenses. The late Grandmaster Soo-nam Park was commissioned by founder Kim Eunseob to bring TKDD to Europe. The seminar in Sindelfingen is open to participants worldwide. Since 2022, the TKDD community has expanded across Europe, now operating in over 20 locations where regular training sessions and color belt examinations are conducted.
